LOGLINE

An ordinary scrap dealer discovers that an old radio he found can listen in on people's private conversations behind closed doors. As he turns this device into a profitable blackmail tool, he enjoys the taste of power but must face the radio's terrifying cost: the more he uses it, the more he permanently loses his own natural hearing.

THE ANATOMY AND CURSE OF THE RADIO

The Advantage: When pointed in a specific direction, the device bypasses physical barriers, transmitting the deepest secrets and whispers spoken behind walls with crystal clarity.

The Cost: The radio is a parasite; it drains its energy from the user's own sense of hearing. As usage increases, the character's natural hearing slowly and irreversibly fades away.

The Final Stage (Madness): When the character becomes completely deaf to the natural world, the radio's capacity reaches an uncontrollable scale. The moment the device is turned on, the voices of thousands of people in the vicinity flood his mind simultaneously, creating an unbearable cacophony.

MAIN CHARACTER: THE SCRAP DEALER

An invisible, lonely man living on the fringes of society, whom no one pays attention to. Finding the radio gives him a "God-like" power and a profound sense of relevance for the first time in his life. Initially just curious, the secrets he hears turn him first into a voyeur, then a ruthless blackmailer. His overwhelming greed for money and control blinds his logic and inevitably destroys his physical health.

STORY ARC (SYNOPSIS)

Act I: Discovery & Curiosity

While working among the debris, the scrap dealer finds an antique-looking radio. That evening at home, when he fixes it and turns the frequency dial, instead of music or news broadcasts, he begins to hear the secret conversations, arguments, and intimate secrets of his neighbors. Realizing the device listens through solid walls, he starts wandering the streets with the radio. Uncovering the truths behind people's masks quickly becomes an addiction.

Act II: Corruption & Blackmail

The scrap dealer decides to monetize this newfound power. He listens to the dark secrets of wealthy and respected individuals, records their conversations, and blackmails them by sending anonymous emails: "If you don't pay what I want, I'll broadcast these recordings to the whole world." The plan works; the money starts flowing in. The scrap dealer transforms his life, moving from the junkyard into luxury. However, there is a sinister side effect: a constant ringing in his ears. He begins to hear the natural sounds around him increasingly muffled. He refuses to seek medical help; greed has completely taken over him.

Act III: The Peak of the Curse & Collapse

The scrap dealer can now barely hear anything naturally; he is on the precipice of complete deafness. He can only interact with the auditory world when he turns on the radio. But the device has mutated. It is no longer just listening to a targeted single room, but the entire city simultaneously. One day, when he turns on the radio, the voices, screams, whispers, and arguments of thousands of people flood into his head all at once. The man writhes in agony, clutching his ears, unable to process the overwhelming noise.

Finale: Surrender to Silence

When he turns off the radio, there is an absolute, deafening silence. When he turns it on, there is the brain-shattering noise of thousands of voices. Caught between two hells and on the verge of total madness, the man makes his final decision. He smashes the radio and throws it into a trash can. When morning comes, he watches the garbage truck empty the bin, crush the radio in its compactor, and drive away. He cannot hear the roar of the truck's engine. The man is left completely alone in his self-created, absolute silent prison. He slowly walks out of the frame. Final Fade Out.
